Are pleased to remind you

1. To dress as if you were going to attend your church, synagogue, or other house of worship, visit the bank for a loan, or make an appearance to defend yourself in court.
2. That it is absolutely imperative that you stay seated (in your own seat), except in cases of dire need or emergency.
(Such cases would include matters of an urgent health nature - impending sickness necessitating a trip to the restroom, continued coughing, or anything that might disturb others - or obvious emergency - danger to audience members, such as fire, natural disaster, building collapse, etc.)
3. That during the performance, it is absolutely important not to talk, sing along, hum, or yell (whether positively or negatively). The general rule is to keep your attention focused upon the performance in front of you.
4. That a slight pause after the end of a composition is sometimes granted by the audience before applause begins as a way of savoring the "magic" of the music before breaking the spell with clapping.
